sensible suggestions for protecting the irver banks: The importance of protecting the banks of the Ohio river cannot be dwelt upon too much by the press of the valley. A good stage of water is bread and meat to an immense number of people; it is trade and prosperity to the remainder of the dwellers in the valley. It would seem that private interest would insure the preservation of the banks, but this is not the case. Many men see their rich bottoms washed out year after year, without attempting to save them. The chief excuse they offer for their folly is the difficulty of raising willows. High water, they say, carries off their fences as last as they can build them, and the cattle get in and eat the tender plants. This is
